In December, 1799, as the first session of the first Legislature of the Northwestern Territory was drawing to a close, that body prepared a flattering address to President Adams, in which, among other compliments, the signers declare: "To your firmness we attribute the enjoyment of the rich country we now inhabit." This is an allusion to the ace negotiations at Paris in 1783, when Great Britain kept insisting as one of the terms of the treaty that the Ohio River should be the limit of the inclined to yield this point as a matter of minor moment if the main object could be gained; but Adams declared that he would withdraw from the conference and urge his countrymen never to lay down their arms until the chain of lakes was accepted as the boundary line. It is difficult now to construct a map even in the imagination wherein Ohio, Indiana, Iilinois, Michigan and Wisconsin should be figured among "British Possessions," the Northwestern Territory was about zero, and there was nothing in the world's experience to encourage the most hopeful to predict the rapid development at which the world has since then mar-

Independence was won by a few colonists who inhabited a narrow strip along the Atlantic coast, representation and persecution of his enemies, and and peace found the great inland territory between the Ohio, the Mississippi and the northern lakes a "dreary wilderness, without constitution, government or law." The April of 1778 was just opening when half a hundred stout-hearted New-Englanders, under the lead of Rufus Putnam, estabshed the earliest settlement at the mouth of the Muskingum. Three months later Governor St. Clair was received with military honors by the garrison of Fort Harmer, where he remained until civil goverament was ceremoniously established on the 15th of July. On that important occasion the Governor's address was greeted with "peals of applause" from the population of what was already a city-on the surveyor's map. Seven years later the white inhabitants of the Territory numbered 15,000, the ceusus of 1800 showed a population of 45,365, and twenty years ago a million fighting men marched out of the same territory and crossed the | terest. Ohio-not then the boundary line between a dependency of Great Britain and the United States, but the boundary line between Freedom and Slaveryto suppress the slave-holders' rebellion.

The early growth of the free West is one of the most interesting chapters in American history. The first settlers were mainly revolutionary soldiers-men who nad been trained to war and whom peace left without an opportunity to practise their only profession. Many of them had lost their fortunes in the struggle, and they chose to brave the perils of the wilderness, where their pride would be subjected to the minimum mortification on account of their poverty. They were not reckless adventurers, out their courage and patience had been proved. They were self-reliant, self-respecting men who had fought for their rights and who might be trusted to maintain them. The world never furnished better material to found a State with. Fortunately, too, the great charter under which the new civil society was organized was the ripened fraitage of the highest political wisdom of the period. The Ordinauce and Compact not only guaranteed torever the principles of institutional liberty which are the common inheritance of the English stock, but a still wider recognition of human rights was made in the sections concerning education, slavery, the Indians and contracts. Ordinance contained very little specific legislation. the plans adopted for securing the needed enactments based upon the broad principles which were laid down as fundamental and organic law. The definite political relations established between the Territory and the Federal authority, and the provisions for changing the character of the local gov ernment to suit the needs of future States as new conditions developed, displayed surpassing wisdom. The severe morality of the Ordinance was no less marked than its practical adaptability to the wants of the new society. Judge Timothy Walker described it as "one of those matchless specimens of in the history of the world," declared Chief Justice Chase, "did a measure of legislation so accurates fulfit and yet so mightily exceed the anticipations of the legislators." Just what part the Ordinance of '87 played in fixing the quality of the civilization which prevailed north of the Ohio, as distinct from anti-slavery clause will never more be questioned.

beginnings of government in the Northwest as organized under this Ordinance. The entire second volume of the work is concerned with correspondence, addresses and other documents covering the period from the passage of the Ordinance in 1787 to the establishment of the first State Government General St. Clair was president of the Congres which adopted the Ordinance. He drafted the bill which was passed by the first Federal Congress for carrying it into effect. He was Governor of the Territory from its foundation until Ohio became a State. Of course his correspondence is rich in material for history. But Mr. Smith has not contented himself with arranging and annotating these papers, after exercising the greatest care in securing complete and correct copies. He has added much besides from the Harmer manuscripts and the Worthington collection, so that the spirit which animated the opposing political, leaders is distinctly portrayed. From the inside view thus obtained we catch glimpses of a bitterness of partisauship which has never been exceeded in the most exciting contests of later times, and persons who are tempted to despair of the Republic on ac count of the rancorous personal feeling which is manifested in the politics of to-day can extract genuine consolation from the proofs here offered that we are quite as temperate as our fathers were. The letter of St. Clair to Secretary Madison, with which the collection closes, is a model of aeridity, but it was called out by an act of official and personal discourtesy by the President and his Premier which is incomprehensible when we consider the character and standing of all the parties. But this was a time when Mr. Jefferson's friends were denouncing the leaders who had stood by Washington through all the trials of the Revolution for a lack of patriotism and a desire to erect a monarchy on the ruins of the Republic, and when on the other hand every orthodox Federalist was convinced that the so-called Republicans were pestilent demagogues who aimed at a total disorganization of society with the hope of picking up some spoils out of the general wreck. Mr. Smith is amply borne out by the correspondence in characterizing this period as the very midsummer of party passion. Governor St. Clair himself is photographed so clearly in these papers that the most careless reader will form a fairly accurate idea of the man. Upon the whole the impression is favorable. His duties were responsible and delicate, and although he failed at times where tact was needed, there can be no question that his Administration was marked by sound practical sense, an intelligent appreciation of the peculiar perils that threatened the new society, and an unusually clear conception of the future possibilities of the Territory. His firmness, courage, integrity and patriotism were beyond all question. The dangers which menaced the Territory from without-Spanish intrigue, British encouragement to hostile savages, and the attempts of French agents to draw the adventurous frontiersmen into the quarrels of Europe-he met with vigor and address. His conservative interpretation of the famous VIth Article, in favor of the glave-holding settlers at Post Vincennes, was the more praiseworthy because of his known hostility to slavery. His treatment of the Indians showed a broader statesmanship and a finer sense of justice than were manifested by the leading spirits of his time. His attitude on all the capital issues which flected the character or stability of the new gov ernment appears now to have been so wisely conservative that it is difficult to understand the venomous attacks made upon him in the later years of his administration. But the heat of political strife goes so far toward accounting for the violence of these assaults that there is no need of attributing pure malice to his opponents. On reviewing the struggle after a lapse of fifty years, Judge Burnet quietly remarks that "many circumstances over which the mantle of oblivion has been thrown might be uncovered, which would account for the conduct of the leaders of both parties without ascribing to them more of self-interest or less of honesty of purpose than falls to the lot of those who are now called consistent politicians. Some part of the Governor's conduct was condemned by his best friends, and was well calculated to excite new Republic. It was believed that even Franklin a warmth of feeling in his opponents, which might have led upright men beyond the limits of moderation and even of justice." This testimony from so judicious a man as Judge Burnet, a political friend of St. Clair, and one who bears witness to his suavity of manner as well as to his uprightness of purpose, is most valuable as emphasizing the general impression of the Governor's character which is made by these papers. His talents were superior and his services valuable, but neither were bril-But at the time of the treaty the present worth of liant. Unfortunately the Governor did not make so modest an estimate of his own powers, and his stately courtesy failed at times when he addressed persons who committed the offence of dissenting from his deliberately formed judgment. This was only a foible, perhaps, but it debilitated his influence. Of course it did not justify the ridicule, miswe can appreciate Mr. Smith's outraged sense of justice when comparing the patriotic and unselfish services of the Governor with the spirit which finally compassed his removal. In his warm advocacy of the Governor's righteons cause, the editor's generous passion draws him into entertaining the same high opinion of his hero which his hero entertained of himself. This partiality, however, does not prevent the latter part of Mr. Smith's biography from being a most interesting monograph. As a summary of the political phases of the early history of the Northwest, it is invaluable. The development of the Territorial Government through its various stages is traced in a connected narrative, and the naturally juiceless details of establishing courts, dividing counties, selecting and administering laws and framing a Constitution for the new State, are invested with a fascinating in-

St. Clair was one of the minority who struggled against the establishment of a State Government. When the Convention met at last, and the dissolu tion of the Territory was at hand, we can appreciate the depth of meaning in the language of the Governor after fourteen years of honest service, when he said: "My feelings have been those of a father who saw the day drawing nigh which was to send a son, over whose education he had long watched with all the varied emotions of parental affection, into the world where dangers wait at every step and where the first would probably be lecisive of his future fortune." No doubt he spoke truthfully, too, when he said, in allusion to his official ability to retaliate upon some of his enemies: "The Governor has always disdained to re venge the injuries offered to the man." He had fairly earned the right to style himself the father of years during which the Territory was under hi charge, he was conscious that his inspiration had been drawn from nobler motives than personal enmittes or favoritism. In addition to this honorable official career, Mr. Smith adduces some ingenious proof to show that the passage of the Ordinance itself was due in a considerable degree to his efforts. The authorship of the most characteristic portions of the Ordinance had been ascribed by various authorities to Jefferson, Nathau Dane and Rufus King, until Mr. Poole seemed to have settled the question finally by giving the entire credit of its passage and the chief credit of its authorship to the Rev. Dr. Manasseh Cutler, of Massachusetts, a versatile gentleman who was at once a theologian, a man of science, and a lobbyist of high degree. This divine is one of the picturesque figures of the age. Representing a large landed interest in the new Territory, the familiar of Franklin and the savants of the time, an author of note, an ex-Member of Congress, and conversant with the ways of legisation, of stately bearing and courtly manners, " given to relating anecdotes and making himself agreeable, sagacious forecast which even the rectless spirit of innovation would not venture to assail." "Never complished women," Dr. Cutler was amply equipped for writing anything-ordinances included nd steering any worthy or profitable measure through Congress. Mr. Smith admits the value of the Dector's manipulations, but he damages his claims as an originator of the capital features of the Ordinance. The treatment of this question by the civilization of the South may not be esti- Mr. Smith is skilful and convincing, and there will mated. > PROTESTANTISM AND THE CHURCH. Lectures de livered in St. Ami's Church on the Sanday evenings of Advent, 1881. By the Right Kev. Monsignov T. S. Frikston, V. G., LL. D., Domestic Prelate to his Holl-ness Leo. XIII. 12mo, pp. 360. Robert Coddington.

Dr. Preston takes up the subject of the "so-called Retormation" from the point of its attack upon the "Christian Church," and undertakes to show that it has aimed to destroy altogether, and for its disciples has really destroyed, the most sacred institution of Christ. After showing the divine institution of the Church" by the repetition of familiar and incontrovertible evidence," he goes on to prove tnat the Protestant Reformation theoretically and practically has destroyed that Church. He then examines the theory of Anglicanism, which he describes as "singular and irrational," placing the Anglican Church in an "impossible" position between the unity of the Church and the disunion of Protestantism, and marking it as the child of the Reformation whose parentage it would gladly disown. The concluding lecture deals with the positive side of the question, presenting the Catholic doctrine concerning the Church, "infallibly taught by the Supreme Pontiff, the Conneils and Fathers of Christian antiquity.

MINES AND MINING.

Robinson Consolidated stock to-day was a wet bianket in the mining-stock markets, because it was weak and declined from 1.05 to 90@91 cents. It, however, exerted little influence beyond, perhaps, the checking of business in other stocks. Chrysolite was 5 cents lower at 3.45, but Iron Silver was strong at 2.20, and Little Pittsburg held its own at 1.30@ 1.35. Navajo continued firm, and, after sales at 2.75. closed unchanged at 2.65. State Line 2 and 3 was steadler at 23724 cents. Green Mountain was strong at 2.25, and Gold Stripe was higher at 29 cents, Cherokee at 29 cents, and Rising Sun at 30 cents.

The La Plata Mining and Smelting Company has declared a dividend (No. 34) of 7½ cents per share and an extra dividend of 2½ cents per share both payable July 1. Transfer books close June 23 and reason July 3.
